Swinney insists Clemson 'hasn't changed'

Tigers signed three 'fits' in transfer portal foray

Matt Hayes
USA TODAY NETWORK

AMELIA ISLAND, FL — We begin with the obvious oddity: In five years of the transfer portal in football, Clemson has signed five players.

Lane Kiffin signs five in one afternoon.

So it should come as no surprise that when asked about his recent wave of portal signings — three in one offseason! — Clemson coach Dabo Swinney stayed true to a process that has delivered seven College Football Playoff appearances in the past 10 seasons.

"This is how we go about our business," Swinney said, while attending the ACC spring meetings. "We're just being who we are, and not apologizing for anything."

But make no mistake, Clemson finally jumped into the transfer portal this offseason. Even if it was in the shallows.

When you go from signing two backup quarterbacks (neither was expected to play) early in the evolution of the portal, to declaring your locker room is your transfer portal, to signing three players this offseason after a first-round loss in the College Football Playoff, that's no coincidence.

Or maybe it's just Clemson adjusting in a changing world it has no control over.

Blue chip defensive end recruit Bryce Davis flipped his commitment to Duke last August, and backup defensive lineman A.J. Hoffer left for ACC rival Georgia Tech after the season. Then there's wideout Noble Johnson, who left for Arizona State.

All three were expected to contribute this season, and all three left significant questions. So Swinney signed his first non-quarterback (defensive) lineman Will Heldt of Purdue, and the best Football Championship Subdivision wide receiver in the portal (Southeast Missouri State's Tristan Smith).

Clemson coach Dabo Swinney says of the tactical signing of three transfers from the portal, "Just following our purpose." KEN RUINARD/IMAGN IMAGES

He also added Alabama linebacker Jeremiah Alexander, who Clemson recruited hard in 2022, as a top backup.

So just to recap (and before everyone gets sideways about Clemson's new change in philosophy): Swinney signed a backup linebacker, a No. 3 or 4 receiver, and a starter on the edge in Heldt, who was one of the best defensive players in the Big Ten by the end of 2024.

That, everyone, was Clemson's big splash in the portal. Its change of philosophy.

"We haven't changed anything," Swinney said. "We're still doing the same thing we've always done. Just following our purpose."

That's what's so unique about the portal moves that really weren't. They were tactical, and they were purposeful. They were fits.

The danger in the portal era is in one-year mercenary signings, players who have a year of eligibility remaining or who know they're leaving for the NFL after the transfer year and aren't invested in the team's philosophy or chemistry. They're interested in money, and moving on.

The fallout, if you're not careful, erodes what coaches and players take years to build. There's a locker room dynamic that already is tenuous, with most players essentially on one-year deals.

When mercenary signings arrive with big paydays, bad individual fits can soil a team-first locker room and generate a potentially combustible situation — and season. An ecosystem of young egos that already is fragile in the era of transfer portal and free player movement can flip with one player.

"They are really committed guys," Swinney said of the three transfers. "They love Clemson, love their teammates and are easy to coach."

Don't tell Swinney he has changed his ways, don't tell him he has finally submitted to chaotic roster and team building in the portal era. That he has embraced the portal and all of its flaws because there's no alternative.

He's still the same driven and foundational secure wall he was as a walk-on wide receiver at Alabama in the early 1990s. Doesn't mean he can't or won't change, it just means he believes in a philosophy that has led to double-digit win seasons in 14 of the last 15 years, the only outlier a nine-win season in 2023.

So yeah, he knows what he's doing, thank-you.

Like he knew he had to fire defensive coordinator Wes Goodwin, who coached with Swinney in some capacity over the last 13 years and most recently running the defense for the last three seasons.

But when the defense couldn't get off the field, and left the Clemson offense with little wiggle room in big games, change had to happen.

So Swinney hired Tom Allen away from Penn State to run his defense.

Allen, of course, fits. He not only is one of the most respected teachers in the game, his unique family-driven personality was the nucleus of his LEO (Love Each Other) mantra at Indiana the foundation of one of the best Hoosiers teams in decades in 2020.

He fits Clemson because Swinney isn't bringing someone into his world that doesn't, or may not.

Just like the three players he signed from the transfer portal.

They fit with a team that returns 16 starters, and a hot quarterback (Cade Klubnik), and a roster that felt what it was like to play in the CFP for the first time since 2020.

Swinney says he isn't changing, but he sure isn't going to roll into a season with roster deficits from a process he can't control.

Especially with a team with so much potential.

"We're lifelong learners," Swinney said. "If you show me somebody who's great at anything, I'll show you a lifelong learner."

Why would anyone apologize for that?

Eagles will be '25 TV fixture but 'tush push' might not

Mike Freeman
Columnist
USA TODAY

This is NFL schedule release week with May 14 being the big day. Of course the defending Super Bowl champion Philadelphia Eagles will figure prominently. Makes total sense. But when next season arrives will the Eagles have their wanted "tush push"?

The answer is likely no which means one of the best plays in recent league history (yes, I said best) could be absent from all of the various screens the Eagles will be on this coming season.

The fate of the play will likely be determined at league meetings starting May 20 in Minneapolis. The NFL delayed a potential ban on the controversial play in the spring during the meetings then. The NFL needs 24 of the 32 team owners to support or deny a rule change.

The belief was that the owners were just delaying the inevitable. No one knows for certain, but the play seems destined to be evicted.

The play is one of my favorites to see. It's not just rugby as some have described it. The elegance of it is its simplicity. It's also not easy to do and requires extensive practice. There's a reason why a number of teams have tried and failed. Laughingly so. One weekend two years ago, three teams tried to do it, and couldn't.

What the Eagles have done is find a secret weapon, refined it, worked on it constantly, and shaped it into something almost unstoppable.

Eagles quarterback Jalen Hurts lines up for the tush push play on the goal line against the Chiefs during Super Bowl 59 at Caesars Superdome.

MARK J. REBILAS/IMAGN IMAGES

The league's response has been not working on a way to stop it, but to try to ban it, like cowards.

One reason for wanting to ban it has been health and safety but the NFL admits there's no definitive data proving that it causes injuries. There were no injuries reported from the "tush push" last season. ESPN reported just 101 of the 35,414 offensive plays in 2024 were tush-push plays, or 0.285%.

I hate, absolutely hate, that the Eagles will be a huge part of the broadcast year next season, and we may not be able to see what's become not just one of their signature plays, but the NFL's.

We already know part of Philadelphia's schedule and the Eagles will be highly visible next season. The team will play in the Thursday night season opener against Dallas, a Week 10 Monday night game against Green Bay, the Black Friday game against Chicago, and a Dec. 20 doubleheader against Washington. Quick note: the Packers were the team that rattled out, err, proposed the "tush push" ban. The Packers also lost to the Eagles twice last season.

Eagles owner Jeffrey Lurie told reporters recently that unless the play is proven to be a health and safety issue, his team should be allowed to continue using it. His quote here is long but I think it's useful to see in its entirety.

"I want to know what data there is," Lurie said. "I don't think there is any. If you want to say that it could be (dangerous), it's hard to make rules on could-bes and should-bes."

"One of the reasons we like using the tush push is we think it's a safer play than the quarterback sneak. The quarterback sneak, if you talk to quarterbacks about it, there's more sparring going on. They're less protected by players around them. And one of the reasons we got motivated to develop an expertise in this play is it was more protective to the quarterback."

"So, it's ironic that people would bring up health and safety. We're at the top of the game in terms of wanting health and safety on every play. We voted for hip-drop tackle and a defenseless receiver."

"We will always, always support what is safer for the players. It's a no-brainer. If this is proven to be less safe for the players, we will be against the tush push."

"But until that's the case, to me, there would be no reason to ban this play."

"I would definitely say there are some people that have health and safety concerns, but there's just as many people that have football concerns," Rich McKay, CEO of the Atlanta Falcons and co-chairman of the NFL's competition committee, has said. "It was much more about the play, the aesthetics of the play, is it what football has been traditionally or is it more of a rugby play?"

It's not a rugby play.

It's gorgeous.

And when the Eagles star across numerous broadcasts this coming season, we may not see it.
